Part I Writing

Nowadays, violent incidents take place at times and have extended to schoolyards. Reports about school violence have aroused great public concern and a lot of discussions.

A number of factors are accountable for this problem. Students are facing so much pressure in study and life that they have little time and energy to care about their mental health. As a result, they tend to deal with problems in a simple and violent way. Another contributing factor is that many evil persons in society have become so insane that they rush into schools to attack the innocent students, and even commit murders, which has been reported frequently in the media and has created great negative effects.

To solve the problem, effective measures should be taken immediately to keep students far away from violence in schoolyards. For one thing, schools should take responsibility for educating students how to relieve the pressure they are facing. For another, we should combine forces of families, schools, and the society to struggle against violence. Only in this way can we enjoy a harmonious school and a happy school life.

A healthy population is a key mark of a prosperous nation and a strong country. Over the last decade, China has embarked on the biggest health care system reform the world has ever seen, aiming to extend health services beyond urban centres. At the start of the century, less than one-third of China's population had access to health insurance. Now nearly 100% do. In brief, China has given its huge population a safety net that protects them from being impoverished by the costs of health care. In 2016, China put forward the Healthy China Initiative, making health a national priority. Through continuous technological advances and improvements to the health insurance system, China hopes to ensure health equity can be basically achieved by 2030.
